Now you can schedule the tasks that you need to perform, rather than having to spend time and energy working on them. You can easily and reliably get going on them whenever you like and by dragging the tasks into the work pool window you can easily view and work on them. Quick access from inside any application The work time can be set for a specific time frame or, if you are working on the same task for a very long time, the time interval you can work on it. The work time is only active when you open the program, so if you open it after work, for example, you will not be able to start working. When it is time to switch off, you can either schedule the end of the work time or simply turn off the program. So depending on your need, it is sufficient to run the program for a few minutes and then stop it. The resulting work time file is in an XML format that is compatible with all time-management programs, and can be used in there. Drag and drop to any application This functionality is available in many programs, but the other way is much more convenient. Just drag and drop the work time files to any application. You can also drag and drop the task entries into the work pool from any application. You can perform both synchronous and asynchronous tasks using this program Synchronous tasks are those tasks that run only when they are activated. They can be short or long, and are usually of critical importance or are must-completed. They must be performed at exactly the specified time and not at all other times. Examples include synchronous web surfing, synchronous online banking and synchronous work. Asynchronous tasks, on the other hand, must be executed at any time when they are activated. They can be short or long, and are important or not important as long as they are not critical. Examples include synchronous Internet surfing, asynchronous on-line banking and asynchronous email. Unfortunately, it is possible that the Internet is not working when the work time file is created, so when opening the program, you have to verify that it is working. The time can be set for a specific time frame or, if you are working on the same task for a very long time, the time interval you can work on it. Upon completion, the work time file is converted to a separate automatic installation package that you can share with others. Work time file can be exported in two formats: RTF and TX
