I heard voices upstairs, quickly got dressed and went out to find my parents and my brothers and sisters standing on the back porch, pointing up at the top floor window. A flash of color, a pink blanket in the snow, and the baby Jesus who was coming to visit us. I now have his picture in my hands and a name to remember him by and today I will thank God for Christmas. I thank God for Christmas, not as a religious sentiment, not as an act of gratitude, not as a moral duty, not as a social duty – but for myself. Just a little luxury I can add to my life. For all the people in a place that I never knew existed. I think the same thing every year on Christmas, and why the music still brings back the memory I pray we all have of a family who spent Christmas at our home before I was born and my dad before he was born. We aimed to assess the relationship between nicotinamide mononucleotide adenylyltransferase 2 (NMNAT2) gene variants and susceptibility to systemic lupus erythematosus (SLE) in Turkish population. This study was performed in 132 female and 95 male patients with SLE and 45 healthy controls. Information about medication and smoking was recorded from patients' records. Genotyping of rs17125944 and rs10736303 variants of NMNAT2 was performed with PCR-RFLP technique. The allele frequency of rs17125944 (G) was statistically significantly higher in female patients with SLE (35.9%, p=0.009) than in healthy female controls (27.2%). Carriers of G allele were statistically significantly more frequent in SLE patients with the presence of antiphospholipid antibodies compared to those without antiphospholipid antibodies (p=0.03, OR: 1.67, 95% CI: 1.02-2.7). Carriers of G allele were not associated with phenotype other than positive antiphospholipid antibody in SLE. No statistically significant difference was found between female and male patients with SLE. Neither the presence of antiphospholipid antibodies nor disease phenotype was associated with the presence of G allele of rs10736303 variant of NMNAT2. Our study revealed that rs17125944 polymorphism is associated with higher risk for SLE with antiphospholipid antibodies.Q: Creating dynamically created table by user in python I need to create a table with the heading and the columns dynamically.
