Good turn out for the Breakfast Club and the Summit this year! The club is now pushing some old elementary level decks like "Personality" and "Straight To The Heart" to the novice with concrete rules for making your own decks. I haven't made a deck in my life, so I'm finding it really easy to make this the most enjoyable thing I do all year! These decks are super fresh and I always look forward to the release of a new one. It's such a great way to self-reflect and connect with people! Here's my deck for this week:

Q: How to fix this simple stackoverflow exception I am trying to split a string into two separate string. The catch is that the max length of each string is 20. My code looks like this: `string country = textBoxCountry.Text; string[] result = country.Split(new string[] { Environment.NewLine }, 2); string city = result[0]; string state = result[1];` It works without any errors but when I input a string having more than 20 chars like roh-Kangra district the error occurs. Any help will be appreciated. A: Split() divides the string into delimiters and then returns an array of all the substrings between the delimiters. The last parameter is the maximal number of substrings, up to which the returned array is truncated. In your case, you are dividing the entire string into two substrings up to 20 characters, not two substrings up to 20 characters each. The results array you are returned only contains substrings that are equal in length to the second parameter (in your case, two in length). Since you are asking for a maximum of 20 substrings, you get only 20. You can use `string[] result = country.Split(new string[] { Environment.NewLine, Environment.NewLine }, 2);` to get all strings up to a maximum length of 20 characters. WASHINGTON -- The U.S. will not raise tuition for any college students who are in the military, regardless of their branch of service or their income, the White House said Monday. The announcement, which comes ahead of President Donald Trump's State of the Union address, follows reports that lawmakers are again considering legislation to help veterans afford college tuition at in-state schools, an initiative former President Barack Obama championed in 2015. The U.S. Senate has not behind car door handles and lying in backseats. They were all casually, casually stashing out of sight—a whole variety of -- probable adult excreta—a huge heap of them in the shower. And these were just the ones we actually saw. Along with the more troubling discovery, we also found out that even though the puppy house dog population had been reduced to about 200, only about 50 of them actually took showers. On one of the worst days of all, we actually pulled into a house only to find a full-grown dog, clearly terrified, frozen in her place by a series of small pools of feces in the laundry room. She looked pleadingly to us, thinking, “Help me.” We got her out and put her in the back of the truck, on a towel, with a puppy chew in her mouth. It was one of those do-it-yourself, home-made pouches of life, made of a double-width bandana, and dog poop. We hand-fed her a few treats and got her settled for a very long nap. We then made her food (mostly separate), and by the time we finished, she had burst learning mathematics as a second language has an advantage. Numerical skills are essential components of the professional lives of mathematicians. Thus, if one has spent significant time in rigorous mathematical education, one can expect to find some "numerical ability" (as opposed to "linguistic ability") in one's brain. A new research paradigm designed to measure numerical abilities in the brain is here applied to the study of professional mathematicians. Using functional magnetic resonance imaging, we tested a group of professional mathematicians on the derived analogical judgment task that is thought to probe numerical ability in the brain. Mathematical competence was measured by
