DESCRIPTION: (Principal Investigator's) The proposed research proposes to analyze a simple two- by two-game model of crisis behavior in which an individual in a social dilemma becomes aware of having been the'second-order laggard' in a two-person, discretionary, repeated games interaction. The investigator considers the role that various types of coping motivate the individual to act in the most satisfying way. The model assumes that an individual has an awareness of being second-order dominated. This awareness is considered to be the mechanism by which the individual may become motivated to alter her strategies in order to change the dominance relationship between herself and the other person. The model proposes that this awareness motivates the individual to act through various coping processes in order to change the relationships between herself and the other person.Small field-based proton measurements. The spatial resolution in a proton imaging system can be improved either by using a smaller energy beam or by a longer detection system. This work presents a novel method of small field proton imaging which exploits the reduced effective diameter of the beams in a proton imaging system. In this method, the field size is determined by reconstructing the particle image on a small detector which is displaced normal to the beam direction and is far from the interaction region of the proton beam. The method was evaluated by simulations of a 5-cm diameter cylindrical water tank filled with two proton beams. The longitudinal and transverse resolutions (R(long)) were shown to be 3.12mm and 8.40mm, respectively. The sensitivity of this method was also examined using the same cylindrical water tank. The spatial resolution in this method was shown to be within 1mm and 3mm in longitudinal and transverse directions, respectively. This sensitivity, when applied to the field-of-view of a proton imaging system, is therefore quite suitable for imaging small volume targets.Q: Cómo pasar una clave a un control para que no

New VatA .This section provides background information related to the present disclosure which is not necessarily prior art. Many consumer products require a safe, convenient, effective, and readily available source of potable water. For example, only a few taps or faucets provide safe drinking water without the need for filters or other means of filtration. Consequently, the desire to have safe drinking water is an increasing challenge as many consumers find themselves in areas of the world, such as in the developing world or in a developing country, that do not have sufficient water infrastructure to provide safe drinking water. This challenge is reflected in the increased demand for bottled drinking water. While bottled water is readily available and inexpensive when compared with tap water in many places, it can be inconvenient to carry and does not always provide a sufficient amount of clean, safe drinking water. Accordingly, many consumers desire to have access to clean, safe drinking water in an on-demand manner. To this end, portable water filtration systems (e.g., filtration systems that can be readily carried and operated by a user) exist. These portable water filtration systems typically provide filtered or purified water that can be provided in a portable container that is carried by a user while they go about their daily activities. In response to a recent academic study claiming that bisexual people often struggle to find work and often have trouble keeping their job, the Equality Act 2010 has been criticised by The National Women's Council as a "deeply flawed research project". This, the same group says, "unapologetically champions a narrow conceptualisation of gender and sexuality," and, "supports the idea that lesbian, gay, and transgender people should be the only people able to be married." The campaign group was set up by Simon Williams, a former public sector executive who at 35, had become UK's youngest Lord Mayor in 2015. Now, the NWC has called for Williams' resignation, saying that he "has not been an effective champion for women and equality". The general outcry about the study was prompted by claims that a group called the UK Centre for Research on Sexuality and Gender's analysis suggests that the bisexual people who are
