many distributions, including ubuntu, ship the "official" java runtime environment (jre) for openjdk in a single.deb file. this package includes the core java libraries, the java virtual machine (jvm), and the java command, and it does not require any additional software installations. nevertheless, it is recommended that you install the full java runtime environment (jre) or java development kit (jdk) on your system. for convenience, you can remove all of your java packages using the java rpms directly, without having to install the yum package manager. this ensures that all of the packages installed are properly registered for updates, but it also removes all java packages in the process: java is a general-purpose computer programming language. it is used for a variety of purposes, including application development, server-side programming, desktop applications, embedded devices, data communication, and running web pages. you can also use java with the java web start technology to package an application with a small java runtime environment (jre) that is needed to run it. there are three java runtime environments: sun java runtime environment (jre) version 5.0 or later sun java runtime environment (jre) version 4.2 or earlier the java development kit (jdk) version 5.0 or later the sun java runtime environment (jre) is no longer supported. sun java runtime environment (jre) version 5.0 or later is no longer supported. sun java runtime environment (jre) version 4.2 or earlier is no longer supported.

in order to avoid prompting the user to confirm which group they belong to, set the gid parameter to root. you should also reconfigure the umask setting in order to ensure that the new group permissions are automatically applied to new files and directories as they are created. you can add the `-xshareclasses:name=apache` parameter to the `org.apache.jakarta.commons.httpclient.httpclient` class in the `commons-httpclient` package. this will tell the commons http client to share a single class loader between all its http handlers. the source code for the apache http server has been modified to have a private static void method named `parserequestline` that always returns 1 when parsing the request line for a get request. this means that http clients use only one socket, even if there is more than one request in the connection. modify the apache http server source code to add the

/etc/init.d/apache2 restart command (this can be done in the current version of apache http server but future versions might not have this.) this will make apache reload its configuration and start with a clean slate. this is required when you re-install apache following the installation of a jdk. the apache serverroot configuration file must be updated by setting the serverroot parameter for the httpd service. this value can be anything, but it must be an absolute path. create this file as shown above, and store it in /etc/httpd/conf.d and re-start the apache service. 5ec8ef588b
