The incremental modulus of elasticity isothermally is determined using the regression analysis method. BISAR is used in conjunction with non-linear analysis of asphalt pavement (Sivakumara, 2013). In the non-linear analysis, we assumed that the strain levels (0.1 and 0.3) are less than the yield point of the asphalt. Asphalt is a weaker material than concrete, asphalt has been proved to be flexible at these strain levels. The nonlinear analysis was used to determine the new modulus value of the asphalt at a given volume strain. A linear elastic model is available for asphalt pavements. Sivakumara (2013) has proved that, under similar road loading conditions, the linear elastic asphalt model is an adequate model for the nonlinear asphalt pavement model. In such a case, the best estimate of the new modulus is used for the asphalt pavement model. In the above figure we can see from the graphs in 3 that as the increase of layer stiffness from 5 cm to 10 cm, the results show that in a case of assumed only horizontal load it leads to reduction in shear stress, but after the addition of vertical load to the horizontal load the reduction in shear stress becomes negligible. The results of multi-layer linear elastic analysis carried out using BISAR-PC software revealed that if the horizontal layer stiffness is varied from 5 cm to 10 cm then the reduction in shear stress due to the addition of vertical load, will be significant. Figure 2: Percent Reduction in shear stress due to Vertical load on a long continuous basis. This plot shows the percent reduction in shear stress caused by the addition of vertical load to the horizontal load. The vertical load of 30% and 60% were assumed here in the graphs.
