We are about to move to a new flat, and are moving all our family heirlooms and things to the new flat. My son has just had his first tooth coming in, but he is having a lot of trouble learning to talk with it. We found it took us about three months before he started smiling, talking, and laughing. However, we just have had our first real issue with his teeth. Yesterday I was giving him lunch (proteins) and when I put it in his mouth he ended up biting his finger. The finger got a bit cut, but it wasn't a severe cut. As it didn't hurt or bleed, I didn't stop him from doing it. My husband came to see what had happened and I told him that it was his first tooth coming in. He said, "oh, I see, that's why he's been upset." I then proceeded to put him in the bath and clean his finger as it was a bit dried out and had a bit of skin on it, so I put some soap on his finger and cleaned it. After I had done this my son came out of the bathroom and said, "Dada, that hurt." I responded, "No, you know you shouldn't do that, and I have cleaned your finger, so why did you do that?" He said, "Well, I was just playing." Now, I'm not going to put him back in the bath, because it is winter and he is soaking wet, and I don't want to get him cold. He wants to be put to bed wet, as he is a bed wetter. He also wants to play with his toy cars, he is currently playing with the heavy and the cars. My question is, should I just wash his finger in the morning, and not put it in the bath? I have washed his hands with soap, because he is a bit of a messy eater, and now I'm worried he will bite them. His hands are usually clean, because we usually wash them together, but I'm worried because his first tooth is coming in. A: I would think as long as the cut was not bleeding I would
