In this study, we examine the capacity of herpes simplex virus (HSV) mucosal vaccines to evoke prolonged immunity. We immunized mice with two doses of attenuated HSV-2 at the genital tract (vaginal/cervical or rectal/coccygeal) after depletion of CD4+ cells. Depletion of either B or T cells with monoclonal antibodies (mAb) was used to evaluate the immunological consequences of this immune response. Furthermore, mice were depleted of subpopulations of T cells before immunization to evaluate the importance of lymphocyte subsets. A significant effect of CD4+ T cell depletion was seen on the persistence of latent virus in the genital mucosa. The antibody responses to HSV were reduced in CD4+ and CD8+ cells depleted mice compared with controls. Although CD8+ T cell depletion had no effect on the retention of herpes antibody in the genital tract, humoral immunity was considerably impaired. It is suggested that an effective immune response to vaccination requires the presence of both CD4+ and CD8+ T cells. The CD4+
